New Super Fuel get safety thumbs up

In regards to safety, the authorities have given PD 3 and 5 the thumbs up after the solution passed all the relevant checks required by law. According to Sam it can also boost the life-span of machinery by detoising engines and ensuring the cleanliness of their components by preventing build up of unburnt fuel. This will also result in financial gains for the user as less time is required for general maintenance, such as servicing, it is claimed. As well as being economically attractive, PDI claim their conditioner has impressive environmental effects, reducing emissions of Carbon Monoxide, Nitrous Oxide, Sulphur Dioxide, Hydrocarbons and Particulates. "It certainly will reduce emissions by at least 60% which is appealing given ever-evolving government legislation and also can help to allay the personal concerns of people over the environment," said Sam. It also reduces the running noise of vehicles and central heating units and is therefore more comfortable for those working in close proximity to the machines. PDI are already established in America, Japan, Denmark, Cyprus and Greece and hope to develop elsewhere including Australia. Sam is confident the product will be a huge success both commercially and domestically.

"There is huge potential for this product. We are already in talks with a major shipping company who have already noticed substantial savings. They are very pleased. "Whatever response industry gets is mirrored with the response the domestic user will get. Be that with their home heating, system, tractor, car, jeep or whatever."

With local businesses testing the conditioner as well as council demonstrating their faith in the product, Sam believes public confidence in the product will build before long.

He said: "We have not approached the domestic market as yet because it takes time to gain the public's trust with a product that is largely unheard of."

"Many people find it unbelievable when we tell them the figures and they are understandably sceptical of the conditioner especially when you consider the hundreds of additives which have come and gone over the years."

"Our product is absolutely unique, there is not another product like it on the market. They ask how can it work, but it does work." For more information contact Sam Brown on 07732 951 825 or email: pdifuelsaver@hotmail.co.uk.
